We, collectively in our close partnership with Egypt, working with the energy sector, and working as a European Union over these last few years have shown that we are capable if we work together to build the right partnerships to make change swiftly and adapt to the changing circumstances. In that context, we see Egypt as a key strategic partner, aiming to further strengthen our partnership including around investments. I think the energy transition is both a security agenda, a climate agenda and is also a just transition and a competitiveness agenda and all of that requires investments.

We need to work more closely together bringing in the private sector to make these necessary investments that will also be part of the European Union and agenda partnership in the coming years.
